There is a new claimant for the invention of steam navigation. Mr. Rumsey, of Ky., in a long speech in Congress a few days ago, claimed the honor for his uncle. He gives an account of a successful experiment made by Rumsey, with a steamboat of his own invention, on the Potomac, as early as the year 1786, one of the witnesses to which as cited in this speech, was Ashton Alexander of Baltimore. Not meeting suitable encouragement here, he went to England, where he became intimate with Fulton, and there died, in an apoplectic fit after having near brought his great discovery to perfection. He was a native of Maryland.
