DESTINY.

I am—began ere a beginning was;
And am, that all else may not be, mine home
Is oblivion! They that neither speak
Nor feel, know I am. My name is written:—
The epitaph of all things!—of life and death!
In their revolutions, the stars set forth
My coming! The moon appeareth in heaven,
And I am by her side! Th' winds howl along
The earth's echoing bosom, and a voice,
From the dun rolling clouds, proclaims me

[there!

The soldier's shed blood,—the victor's laurels!
And the Capulets, are mine, and the dead,
Are in my bosom!—and I do nurse them!
Upon mountain rocks, that long have braved
The thunder's fiery strength, my foot-steps are!
On the brows of men, I sit, and there watch
The stream of life!—my presence calms or

[clouds

Its mystic flow! On the blue ocean's breast
Where no tract by mortal eye, was e'er seen
My march is measured! deep, everlasting!
Th' spirit of the past, rising from the home
Of the dead, is my spirit! and the voice
Of other times echoed back, from the dim
Solitude of forgetfulness, is my voice!
I have a power that none can fathom:—
And a strange presence! my pale, silent wings
Sweep o'er the dull reign of matter and life,
Whose breath can dry the tears of those that

[weep

And open the fount of sorrow, of those
That never wept before, I am no tyrant:
But at my name they that think, turn pale!
For it is carved upon the arms of death!
Before me nothing could have been, after me
Nothing is to be. When nature's last is come
I'll be there, to close her eyes, when the pall
Is spread, and t' fix her epitaph, and to watch
Her sleeping thro' all eternity. I
Was the first and shall be he last to look
Upon a sepulchre, but not to weep,
For I knew myself—I AM DESTINY.
