RHYMES—TO ABNER.

"Oh Emilee, Oh Emily,
What poetree, what poetry?"
Gen. Jackson.

Poetic sprig of "common law."
If, haply, you detect a flaw
In any luckless word or line
Of this attempted strain of mine,
Don't criticise it like a plea,
But "let its imperfections be:"
Deal gently with—me don't abuse
The maiden effort of a muse
To Madam Fame as yet unknown,
That dares not emulate your own.
I'm not, like you, a full blown poet;
My greatness still is in the bud;
And when I rhyme, I needs must "go it"
O'er common roads, through dust and mud,
While you, assisted by the Powers
That aided Homér's flight of yore,
High as the turkey-buzzard towers,
Borne on the wings of Fancy, soar!
Why, Abner, why have you been idle,
And "silence drear" so long maintained!
Did your Pegasus slip his bridle!
Or were his wings in flying sprained!
Or were you o'er his crupper flung,
And sorely bruised, when last you sung!
Or were your fires restrained by law,
And you condemned to "hold your jaw"!
For many days of late I feared
That you had laid aside your pen;
But when at length your "Thoughts" ap-
[peared,
Expiring Hope revived again,
And I rejoiced once more to see
Your own unrivalled poetry.
I read the whole effusion twice,
And must admit 'twas "very nice."
The skillful grace with which you seem
To manage your immortal theme—
The harmony of all your lines—
The many most undoubted signs
Of rare and awful depth of thought—
With which your dulcet song is fraught—
The ease with which you wield on high
Enormous words and make them fly
Beyond our ken at least a mile—
Your neat, correct, and nervous style—
Combine, if any thing can show it,
To mark you as a matchless poet.
Now, having shown what you can do,
Let not such powers run to waste;
Persist to write—and publish, too!
Correct our vile poetic taste,
And teach us how to understand
The hidden music of your lyre:
And then the men of every land
The verse of ABNER shall admire;
And loudly shall the trump of Fame
Make Earth re-echo with his name;
And until Time itself be fled
No verse save his shall e'er be read;
And after Time is with the Past
His deathless name alone shall last!
