

the affairs of the Legislative branch, thus reducing our beautifully-modelled and nicely-balanced republican system of government to a more centralism—which has in reality been its tendency since Gen. Jackson first "took the responsibility."

The Whigs will never set at naught that wholesome and divine maxim, enshrined in the Declaration of Independence, "that governments are instituted for the benefit of the governed." Therefore, if they were not themselves the people as the recent struggle has shown them to be they would never consider the Government did its whole duty when it "took care of itself" and left the people to "take care of themselves."

In time, the Whigs will not do as the present Administration have done. They will not attempt to rule by misrule; to retain power by the abuse of it; and to perpetuate themselves in office by bribery, falsehood, and unhallowed corruption.—Low Jour.
